One of the greatest reasons for which I have paid so much attention to education is that I have the impression that, in many cases, the so called backward areas tend to look at the advanced areas and to say we want to be like you. I do not think that any of us could argue against the fact that the leading areas of the world are outside the Asian and African zones of this earth. Though we may try to emulate the advanced areas, I have often been worried that emulation would tend to mean full scale copying or even the closest identification possible. I cannot say that I would ever approve of our losing our true identity and I think that one of the greatest ways to avoid this danger is to see that our children are equipped with the most advanced intellectual weapons possible but that they should receive this equipment in their own homes against the background of their own society, their own traditions and their own beliefs.
